

Acknowledgments

In planning this book, which originates from my dissertation, I have had help from many people. The strong interdisciplinary character of this study largely reflects my scholarly path, which started with studying art conservation in Bologna, continued with art history in Berlin and Krakow, and ended (for now) with history of science in Berlin. I would like to acknowledge the time that many people dedicated to answering my questions and connecting me with the right interlocutors. I owe my deepest gratitude to my supervisors, Friedrich Steinle and Karin Leonhard. Friedrich's comments and enthusiasm were invaluable to this research project, and Karin's encouragement helped me determine the final structure of this book.

The path that led me to the final version of this book crossed many disciplinary boundaries, and I have benefited from the advice of many experts. I would first like to thank Sarah Lowengard for offering to read and correct the English in the introduction and conclusions of this work and for providing wise suggestions, amendments, and a flattering preface to this book. Additionally, André Karliczek allowed me to utilize a bibliography on color science that he has compiled over the past 10 years, and he shared advice on many occasions. Bruno Belhoste also graciously provided free access to his material on Antoine Quémizet. I spent many hours with Hans Walter Lack discussing the color knowledge of the Bauer brothers and the botanist Carl Ludwig Willdenow. He also showed me precious material from the library of the Botanischer Garten in Berlin and made great suggestions for further reading. Ad Stijnman offered to review the section of my thesis on Jacob Christoff Le Blon. I treasure his insightful comments, although I had to revolutionize the structure of this section at a second stage. While in Munich, I had the honor of meeting with Kärin Nickelsen and her former PhD student, Henriette Müller-Ahrndt, to discuss the practice of coloring natural history illustrations and the strategy proposed by Jacob Christian Schäffer in 1769. After I left Munich, Henriette kindly sent me material that was available only in Munich as well as some of her transcription work on the Trew correspondence. Florike Egmond also translated Old Dutch sentences into readable English for me, and I integrated the information into this book. Furthermore, Truusje Goedings and Erma Hermens shared their extensive knowledge on Boogert's manuscript, and Carmen Götz introduced me to other researchers at Berliner-Brandenburgische Akademie der Wissenschaften and Technische Universität Bergakademie Freiberg. I am especially grateful to Gerhard Heide, who invited me to discuss part of my thesis at the research colloquium at Freiberg in early 2021, where I was able to test certain ideas about Abraham Gottlob Werner. Eef Overgaauw, the director of the manuscript department at the National Library in Berlin, generously helped me date some handwritten material that I consider in this book. I am also very thankful to Peter Davidson, Mary Nemeth, and Joyce Dixon for granting me access to their material on Patrick Syme after I published a paper on his color guide in 2018. My sincere gratitude also goes to Stefanie Jovanovic-Kruspel, who read and commented my chapter on Ignaz Schiffermüller.

Librarians and archivists have been incredibly helpful during my research travels. I would particularly like to thank Dominik Riedl and Robert Pils from the archive of the Natural History Museum in Vienna, with whom I spent numerous hours discussing the hand-coloring method used by the Bauer brothers. Many thanks also to Wolfgang Kainrath, who helped me track down the copies of Christian Friedrich Prange's Farbenlexicon owned by the University Library in Vienna. Since the pandemic prevented me from visiting the National Library in Stuttgart to review its copy of Farbenlexicon, Esther Sturm provided me with valuable information about its provenance history. Marco Girardi of the Biblioteca Civica in Verona also explained the story and whereabouts of Giovanni Antonio Scopoli's correspondence. While in Verona, I spent some days at the library of the city's Natural History Museum to examine rare books on the life and works of Scopoli. The staff generously offered me a private tour of the collection in the museum, which made my research days less solitary. I must also acknowledge Allard Schierenberg of Antiquariaat Schierenberg, who gave me two photographs of a very rare book, A New Treatise on Flower Painting (1818) by George Brookshaw, at no cost.

I would like to thank my friends and colleagues Karin Pelte, Eyke Huth, Adrian Wütrich, Arianna Borrelli, and Cesare Pastorino for the nice time we spent together at the university and the great conversations we had before the pandemic started in early 2020. For our phone conversations and the material they procured for me from inaccessible libraries before and during the pandemic, I owe many thanks to my friends and colleagues, Valeria Paruzzo and V.E. Mandrij. My gratitude goes also to Lea Stengel for her precious support at the Technische Universität Berlin. Finally, I am most grateful to Andrea, who helped me cope with the difficulties of writing my dissertation and developing it into a book during the COVID-19 pandemic.
